the 1990s, the number of people in the world who are living in poverty has increased from 1.2 billion to 1.6 billion (World Bank, 2000).

There are many reasons for the increase in poverty. One of the main reasons is the rapid population growth in the developing countries. The population of the world is expected to reach 8 billion by the year 2025 (United Nations, 2000). This rapid population growth is putting a strain on the natural resources and the environment, which are already being degraded by human activities.

Another reason for the increase in poverty is the unequal distribution of income and wealth. In many developing countries, a small number of people own most of the land and the capital, while the majority of the population is poor and has no access to these resources. This inequality is making it difficult for the poor to improve their living standards.

There are also many other factors that are contributing to the increase in poverty, such as the lack of education and skills, the corruption of the government, and the impact of globalisation. These factors are all making it difficult for the poor to escape their poverty and improve their lives.

It is clear that the problem of poverty is a complex one and requires a multi-faceted approach. We need to address the underlying causes of poverty, such as the unequal distribution of resources and the lack of education and skills. We also need to improve the governance of the developing countries and to ensure that the benefits of globalisation are shared by all.

Only by taking these steps can we hope to reduce the number of people living in poverty and to create a more just and equitable world for all.

The World Bank has identified several key areas for action to reduce poverty. These include: (1) increasing investment in infrastructure, (2) improving the quality of education and health care, (3) strengthening the legal and judicial systems, and (4) promoting private sector growth and employment.

These are all important steps, but they are not enough. We also need to address the issue of income redistribution. In many developing countries, the government has a responsibility to redistribute income and wealth in a way that is fair and equitable. This can be done through a variety of means, such as progressive taxation and social welfare programs.

It is also important to address the issue of environmental degradation. The degradation of the natural resources and the environment is making it difficult for the poor to sustain their livelihoods. We need to take steps to protect the environment and to ensure that the natural resources are used in a sustainable way.

Finally, we need to address the issue of globalisation. Globalisation is a double-edged sword. While it has brought many benefits to the world, it has also brought many challenges. We need to ensure that the benefits of globalisation are shared by all and that the challenges are addressed in a fair and equitable way.

the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are aged 65 and over has increased from 10.5 million to 13.5 million, and the number of people aged 75 and over has increased from 4.5 million to 6.5 million (Office for National Statistics 2000).

There is a growing awareness of the need to address the needs of older people, and the need to ensure that the health care system is able to meet the needs of older people. The Department of Health (2000) has published a strategy for older people, which sets out the government's commitment to older people and the need to ensure that the health care system is able to meet the needs of older people.

The strategy for older people (Department of Health 2000) sets out the government's commitment to older people and the need to ensure that the health care system is able to meet the needs of older people. The strategy is based on the following principles:

- Older people should be able to live independently and actively in their own homes.
- Older people should be able to access the services they need to live independently and actively in their own homes.
